

Section B

Section B consists of three distinct areas which are referred to in the burial order book as:

- Upper Terrace
- Eastern Bank
- Western Bank

The area can be reached from the chapel by two paths that go around Section A at its eastern and western ends. At the western end is a gap in the wall that leads to a path in the adjacent Smallcombe Vale Cemetery. Stone gateposts at the western end suggest that once there were gates and, in the undergrowth, are the remains of a green, wooden gate.

The Upper Terrace runs the full extent of the area from the walls at the eastern and western ends of the old extent of the cemetery. The eastern end is higher.

The Eastern Bank is a steeply sloping triangle of land which is bounded at the eastern end by the boundary wall. Access to it is either by a narrow sloping path from the diagonal path from Section A or a horizontal path from the descent from the Upper Terrace. Both these paths are well used by walkers accessing Smallcombe Wood through a break in the boundary wall.

The Western Bank is a triangle of land below the Upper Terrace on the western side. It has a row of graves in a line along the boundary with the Upper Terrace and, on a plateau below this a group of graves laid out in a grid. Access to the area is from the upper section of the diagonal path that links the Upper Terrace with the eastern end of Section A. However access to the row of graves by the Upper Terrace is perilous as they are below the upper path and cannot be readily reached from it and there is no path running alongside them.

The burial order book does not specify the locations of graves in this section, merely designating one of 'upper terrace', 'eastern bank' and 'western bank'. The numbering of graves in this document is arbitrary and is based on the survey of their locations. There is a maximum of five graves per row in the upper terrace. The row identifiers come from previous surveys.

The costs of plots in Section B were significantly greater than in other parts of the cemetery.

Educated in England, he returned to work on his father's scattered stations; in the 1850s he managed Brookong. On 27 January 1864 at Earley, near Reading, Berkshire, he married Elizabeth Jane (Jeanie), daughter of Major-General E. H. Atkinson. They returned to Lakelands, Dapto. In November Osborne was asked to contest the Illawarra seat in the Legislative Assembly. He told his electors that he had 'no desire to enter Parliament unless as an independent member, totally unfettered by pledges' and maintained that the wealthy classes should contribute more to the revenue; yet the Illawarra Mercury taunted him with supporting James Martin's ministry. In December he won by a comfortable majority but proved an inactive member and resigned without explanation to his constituents on 4 August 1866 and again visited England. In 1865 Osborne bought Currandooley on Lake George and told his wife that she would 'have to rough it a little'. A keen shot, he was impressed by 'no end of Wild Duck, Swans and a variety of other game'. Wild horses were on the station and he later introduced deer. In 1873 he built a mansion where they entertained governors, neighbours and English visitors. He continued with his brothers to have an interest in his father's stations and coal-mines in Illawarra and Maitland including the Osborne Wallsend colliery at Wollongong. He had mining leases of his own and speculated moderately in mining shares. In the 1870s and 1880s he bought and sold stations; in 1875 he acquired Orange Plains on the Bogan with his brother George whom he bought out in 1883. By 1902 in addition to Currandooley and Orange

		Plains he had Willeroo, Douro and Gundaroo and five other properties. He travelled widely to his scattered stations and Sydney. In 1888 he bought shearing machinery from F. Y. Wolseley but unfortunately when shearing came round in November 'the machinery was not working well'. An energetic race-goer, he bred horses from his thoroughbred mares to carry his all-green colours at local southern meetings. With Acmena he won the Australian Jockey Club's Champagne Stakes and Oaks in 1894, and several good races in England. He visited England where he had an estate Karenza, near Cheltenham. About 1898 he raised a local contingent of the 1st Australian Horse. Its Easter encampment was on Currandooley, where Osborne provided free rations, transport and forage besides entertaining the officers to dinner. In 1899 his fifth son Lieutenant James Bunbury Nott went with the 1st Australian Horse to South Africa; he later married the American actress Maud Jeffries. Pat Osborne died suddenly from uraemia at Currandooley on 17 October 1902 and was buried with Anglican rites. He was survived by his wife, four sons and five daughters to whom he left an estate valued for probate at over £225,000. His widow returned to London and entertained many Australian soldiers in World War I. From a transcription by Barry Stephenson (date 1 Jun 2004) of memorials at Currandooley Cemetery, Bungendore, Southern Tablelands Region, NSW, Australia: Montague, Ellen (nee Poulter), b. Branch Johnson (David & Charles, Newton Abbot, 1970): By 1806 Paumier had given place at Rookery Mill to his son-in-law Harty, about whom little is known except that, according to Hassell's Tour of the Grand Junction Canal, he ran 'the celebrated silk mills'; and by 1826 to Thomas Rock Shute, born at Sydenham, Kent in 1802 and thus a very young man for his position. Whether Shute's family had any previous connection with the silk industry has not been discovered; at any rate, he evidently made a success at Watford, since he continued there until his death in 1881. Then the mill closed down, becoming in turn a steam laundry and a piano factory; today, after a destructive fire, its remains (with recent extensions) house several small firms of engineers and joiners. The Book of Watford A portrait of our town, by J B Nunn 1st Edition, 1987 includes extracts from the 1832 Parliamentary report on a "Bill to regulate the labour of children in the mills and factories of the United Kingdom." and this includes descriptions of the conditions at
