George Leonard Jenyns (1763-1848) of Bottisham Hall, Cambridgeshire, and his wife Mary (1763-1832) the daughter of Dr. William Heberden (1710-1801). In 1831 he was offered a place as naturalist on the Beagle for its voyage of exploration but he declined because of parochial duties, the place then being offered to Charles Darwin. In July 1871 he was left the property of a cousin of his father Francis Blomefield who died in 1817. To inherit he had to assume the name of Blomefield, it was worth more than £7000 and came with 140 acres near Diss, Norfolk. In 1844 married Jane Daubeny, daughter of Rev Edward Daubeny. Jane Blomefield died in 1860 and was buried at Swainswick Church. In 1861 he married Sarah Hawthorn. Leonard Blomefield died on 1 Sep 1894 at 19 Belmont, Bath.

Born in at Rosebank House, Donaghadee, Co. Down, Ireland fourth child of Lieut Edward Bellenden Clarke (1813-1862), RN, & Margaret Bell Sherwood (1813-1874). She married an army surgeon at 16. From 1873-1878 they were in the East Indies. She separated from him in 1892 after the commercial success of a first novel, Ideala (1888). The Heavenly Twins (1893), a series of interconnected tales, deals with marital abuse. The Beth Book: A Study in the Life of a Woman of Genius (1897) is autobiographical, and contains lengthy passages on women's rights. Other novels include The Domestic Experiment (1891), The Modern Man and Maid (1898), Emotional Moments (1903), and The Winged Victory (1916). According to Dr Louis James in The Victorian Novel (Blackwell, 2006) "The phrase 'the new woman' was coined in 1894 by Sarah Grand [Frances Elizabeth McFall] (1854-1943) to represent a new phase in female emancipation." In her essay "The New Aspects of the Woman Question," which appeared in the North American Review (158 (1984): 270-76.), she wrote that "the new woman" is one who "has been sitting apart in silent contemplation all these years thinking and thinking, until at last she solved the problem and proclaimed for herself what was wrong with the Home-is-the-Woman's-Sphere, and prescribed the remedy." She moved to Bath in

I got my chief to let me go in charge of them, and we got the approval of the Accra Officer Commanding Troops and the Acting Governor. I was delighted, and rushed off to tell my wife, and she was not going to be out of anything, so off she went to the Principal Medical Officer, and arranged that she should go if the Officer Commanding Column agreed (she had volunteered for Red Cross work the day war was declared, being a trained nurse). It was a very busy day selecting the men who were to go, and getting them fitted out with kit, etc. ; of course, they all wanted to go, and it went to one's heart to refuse them all, but it could not be helped. It made me have a lump in my throat with joy and pride at their keenness. The Officer Commanding Column landed, and we received orders to be on board the transport at 5 p.m., and I heard my wife was to follow in a day or so, so that was all right. The police detachment paraded later on at Ussher Fort, and off they marched to the beach. The men who were left behind showed up good sportsmen, and crowded out helter skelter into the street and gave the detachment a splendid send-off, cheering again and again. The public, of course, quickly crowded up, and when they found out what it was, joined in the cheering.

Lady Affleck, who has divorced her husband, Sir Robert Affleck, had an interesting experience after parting with him. She decided that her financial position compelled her at once to seek a living, and, being a sensible woman with very little snobbery about her, she sought a position in a large English department store. Her attractions, personality, knowledge of foreign languages and other excellent qualifications quickly enabled her to find an admirable position. For she became second saleswoman in the costume department of one of the largest establishments in Oxford street, London, and, under the name of "Madame Julie," soon made a great reputation as a splendid business woman. "I had some rather amusing experiences," says she. "One day I had just concluded a sale in French with a Parisian customer and as I turned away another customer patronizingly remarked. (Laughter.) If so, they would permit him to say that he had a Scottish mother, that he spent his early days in Edinburgh and Musselburgh, and that he married a Scottish wife, who declared he was "daft about Burns." (Laughter.) He thought after what he had seen and heard at Dumfries, Glasgow, and elsewhere he would be dafter still. (Renewed laughter.) He had been acquainted with both the Poet's soldier-sons. Colonel William Nicol Burns and Colonel James Glencairn Burns, the latter of whom married his (the speaker's) cousin, Sarah Robinson, a Yorkshire lady, out of his father's house, in 1818. He made the acquaintance of both soldiers in 1843, before he went out to India. They had settled in Cheltenham, and there he had the honour and pleasure of great intimacy with them. When the Colonels were at Gravesend, and he a youngster doing duty with the Royal Engineers establishment at Chatham, they did him the honour of occasionally coming over and dining with him at mess. On one memorable occasion, 18th June, 1843, they had a very pleasant evening, in the course of which Colonel James Burns, who had a very sweet voice, and had all his father's verses at his fingers' end, gave two or three delightful songs, which were heartily enjoyed. He (the speaker) wanted something more, and said, "Could you not favour us with 'Scots Wha Hae?'" He said, "I'm not up to that song on every occasion. I require to be wound up to a certain pitch before I dare attempt it." "Well, you're forgetting that this is Waterloo day; is that not enough for you?" Up Colonel Burns thereupon jumped, and sang it in glorious style. (Applause.) Alluding to the Reserve Forces, General Warren Wallace made sympathetic reference to the death of Lady Wemyss, whose husband was one of the earliest supporters of the Volunteer movement." See also 4.A.22.

The family story is that they escaped the country during the Peninsular Wars and rebuilt their business in London. The Peninsular War occurred 1808-1814 and they must have gone back at some stage as they had a son Charles born in Spain circa 1825. Naturalized by Act of Parliament, he founded the eminent trading house of Frederick Huth & Co. He was created a Knight of the Order of Guelph of Hanover and, for services to the Spanish government, he received the Order of Charles III of Spain. He was one of the first merchant bankers and with his contacts in Spain and Germany built up one of the country's largest firms. Home from the Hill: a biography of Frederick Huth, 'Napoleon of the city', by Andrew John Murray (London: Hamilton, 1970). From a posting at Rootsweb by Peter Deloriot on 7 Mar 1999 (with typographical errors corrected): "Friedrich Andreas HUTH was the grandson of a grenadier in the service of the Elector of Hanover. He was born in Stade and was taken on as an apprentice to the URBIETAS bank when 14. He showed such promise that when he was 18 he was sent to Corunna to look after the bank's interests in Spain. It was there that he met Manuela MAYFREN, the ward of Don Antonio MAYFREN, the governor of that town. They married on January 11, 1806 in Corunna on Manuela's 21st Birthday. For some reason Frederick was entrusted with the royal family's jewels when it became obvious that Napoleon wanted Spain. It was on the basis of this huge fortune that F went to England and became a banker there. He became known as the 'Napoleon of the City'. He had enormous power
